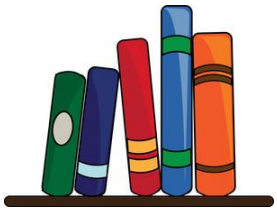
Wednesday 24th February

Telling your own personal story

We all have our own stories. Some are personal tales; experiences linked to emotions that stay captive in our memories for years to come. Others are family tales passed down from one family member to another. The story changes each time it is told but the main essence of it stays the same.

Think back to the work you completed with Mrs Fleming on Monday, where you thought about different experiences linked to your emotions. Which story would you choose to publish in a book and share with people selecting it from the shelve in the local library?

Have a go at writing your story below. Really describe what happened and how you felt. Use your story telling language to link the parts of the story together. This is only a rough draft, before we write up our final copy tomorrow, so don't worry about getting it perfect. Maybe a grown-up at home can help you edit it after you have finished.



'Everyone's story matters,' said Morris.

So what is yours…

Sometimes Morris would become lost in a book and scarcely emerge
for days.