Illustrators

The book has some beautiful illustrations. I found it very amusing that the books seem to come alive. I like that they have legs and float around the page as you read. I like to think that they open themselves up to the most exciting pages trying to entice you to read them. I think I would like to be followed around by the books that are stacked high on my bedside table waiting to be read. It would be a constant reminder to make time to read and enjoy a story when I find myself with 5 minutes space. I also like how Morris finds himself moving along the letters in the book; swinging from letters, jumping across sentences and cascading them as he falls. I've added a few examples below so you can take a closer look.

Have a go at drawing some of your own flying books, or books with legs. Maybe they will follow you around like a giant book conga or perch on your arm like a talking parrot. Play around with letters and how a mini version of you might travel around a book. I wonder which letter would be the most comfortable for an afternoon nap... We can use them later in the week to illustrate our own stories.

Here are some of my examples:
